Peter A. Feldman
Acting Chairman
U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission
441 G Street NW
Washington, D.C. 20548

Dear Acting Chair Feldman:

We are writing with concern about reports of serious harm to babies associated with Millie Moon diapers manufactured by ZURU Inc. Parents in America should not be facing these scenarios without confidence that the full weight of the U.S. government treats their experience with urgency and thoroughness. Given the severity of these reports, we urge the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) to work with ZURU Inc. to initiate a recall of Millie Moon diapers while the reported infant injuries are thoroughly investigated. If the manufacturer is unwilling to take appropriate voluntary action, we urge the Commission to consider issuing an immediate Product Safety Warning to alert consumers to the potential risks. Families deserve answers, transparency about the origin of the materials used in the products they purchase, and manufacturers who are accountable for their safety.

Parents and caregivers depend on diapers to provide safe, reliable protection for their children during the most sensitive stages of development. When concerns arise regarding a product used in prolonged contact with an infant's skin, families deserve timely, transparent information and confidence that appropriate safety measures are being taken.

According to reports identified on SaferProducts.gov, more than 700 complaints have been submitted about Millie Moon diapers in the past six months. These reports include allegations of severe chemical burns requiring medical treatment, including emergency room visits. The volume and severity of these reported incidents warrants swift and careful examination. Protecting children from preventable harm must remain a central priority of federal consumer protection efforts.

We request that the Commission work with ZURU Inc. to initiate a recall of Millie Moon diapers while conducting a thorough review of consumer complaints and incident reports. If the company is not cooperative, CPSC should issue an immediate Product Safety Warning to urge consumers not to purchase or use these products during the investigation.

During the review, the Commission should take the following action:

1. Test the product. Evaluate the diaper's materials, including its Elemental Chlorine Free (ECF) pulp, and other components that could contribute to skin irritation or injury.
2. Get answers from the manufacturer. Engage with ZURU Inc. to review the product's composition, quality-control procedures, safety assessments, and any internal records of consumer complaints or adverse reactions.
3. Keep families informed. Provide clear guidance to parents and caregivers on how to report adverse reactions, document their experiences, and find reliable updates about the Commission's findings.

Families trust the products sold on shelves in the United States, but when credible concerns about children's safety have them second guessing, our consumer protection system needs to respond with clear answers and action grounded in evidence.

That need for transparency and accountability underscores the importance of strengthening domestic manufacturing, including American pulp mills and hygiene-product production. We need the capacity to produce essential goods here at home, backed by strong safety standards and oversight throughout the supply chain. Investing in American manufacturing supports skilled jobs, strengthens our supply chains, and helps give families confidence in the products they depend on every day.

Thank you for your attention to this matter and for the Commission's work to protect infants and young children. We respectfully request a written response outlining the steps the Commission will take to evaluate and address these concerns.

Sincerely,

Marie Gluesenkamp Perez
